Careers in Horticulture

Horticulture has four main branches. Pomology is the growing of tree fruits and nuts. Floriculture is the growing and selling of flowers and potted plants. Olericulture is the growing of vegetable crops. Landscape and nursery work covers growing, planting and caring for trees, shrubs, grasses and annual plants around homes and parks.

Many horticulture jobs are outdoors. Landscapers, orchard workers, and park and golf course crews use hand-operated tools such as pruners, shovels, rakes and trimmers. Indoor jobs include greenhouse workers, who water, transplant and space plants in a warm and humid environment, and florists, who design arrangements.

Sales jobs matter too. A garden center salesperson should have a background in horticulture, not just sales, so that customers get correct advice about which plants will grow and how to care for them. As the population grows and more homes are built, demand for landscaping, nursery plants and food crops keeps rising.

To get a job you need a resume, which lists your skills, experience and education, and references, adults who can describe your work. In an interview, you greet the employer, answer questions clearly with examples, and say thank you.
