Reading the Past: Timelines and Political Cartoons

Historians put events on a timeline so we can see what came first and what came later. Order matters: one event often causes the next. For example, the Civil War ended in 1865, and the years after it shaped how the country grew west.

This year we study about 1865 to the 1930s. In that time the United States moved west, took in millions of immigrants, became an industrial nation, fought in World War I, gave women the vote in 1920 and fell into the Great Depression after the 1929 stock market crash.

A political cartoon is a drawing about news, government or society. It is not meant to be fair. It shows the cartoonist's opinion and tries to persuade the reader. Cartoons made at the time are primary sources: they show what some people thought back then.

Our class uses BASIC to read cartoons. Background: what do you already know about the event? Argument: what does the artist want you to believe? Symbols: what do the pictures stand for? Indicators: what do the words, labels and captions tell you? Caricature: what is exaggerated?

In 1871 Thomas Nast drew New York politician Boss Tweed with a bag of money for a head. The caricature and the money-bag symbol make one clear argument: Tweed was greedy and corrupt. Readers who could not read well could still understand the message.

B.A.S.I.C. in your own words

1. B (Background): How does background knowledge help a person understand a political cartoon?
You need to know the events and people of the time to get the joke or point.

2. Why is it harder to understand cartoons from the 1800s than today's cartoons?
We do not know the people, events and symbols of that time as well.

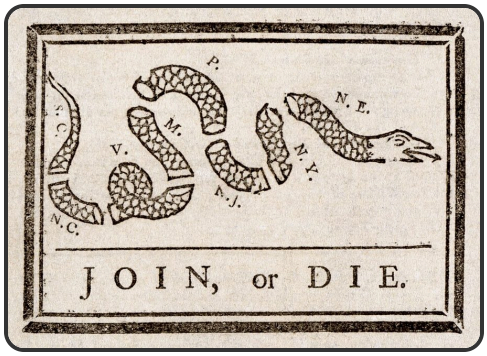

3. A (Argument): What is the goal of a political cartoon? Where in a newspaper do you find them, and why not in the comics section?
To persuade / give an opinion on an issue. On the editorial (opinion) page, because they are opinions, not just jokes.

4. S (Symbols): How are symbols used? List 3 symbols most Americans would recognize.
A picture stands for a bigger idea. Uncle Sam/eagle = USA, donkey/elephant = parties, dove = peace, $ = money.

5. I (Indicators): Where can you find indicators, and why read all of them?
Titles, labels, captions, speech bubbles. They tell who and what is shown, so you don't miss the point.

6. C (Caricature): Why is caricature used? Why are stereotypes in old cartoons a problem?
Exaggeration makes the point stronger. Stereotypes treat a whole group unfairly; many old cartoons were racist or cruel.
